

CHARLES-TOWN: Printed by PETER TIMOTHY, Printer to the Honourable the COMMONS HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY.

To the FREEHOLDERS of the Colony

SOUTH-CAROLINA.

My dear COUNTRYMEN,

THE Guardian God of these extended Colonies, has hitherto remarkably interposed, to ward off the iron blow of Oppression. Our most sanguine expectations have been exceeded. The thick cloud breaks underneath, and here and there discloses an hard sky. Your hearts begin to be relieved, by the distant prospect of basking once more in the fair beam of Liberty. 'Tis impossible that, among the various interests of innumerable societies and individuals in so wide an empire, some should not suffer, by any one plan of operation that could be devised by the wit of man. What could be done by men, in their circumstances, has been done by the Congress. The wisdom of its decisions, gives high pleasure to every Good Man, and marks the cheek of Court-Sycophants with a timid paleness. They have been firm without rashness: they have acted in a decisive manner, tempered with all that tenderness, to every part, which our urgent necessities required. They have acted like men who felt their ALL at stake. It must swell the heart of every lover of his Country with unusual joy, to find their votes taking place throughout the Continent, with the force and vigour of Law. Every privilege that we enjoy above the lowest vassals; nay, the first law of nature, Self-Preservation, calls upon us, to give the decrees effect. The man who directly or indirectly does any thing to defeat them, aims a poignard at your vitals: He ought to be treated as an assassin. I bear with the man who disputes me out of Euclid's demonstrations: I forgive the man who differs from me ever so widely, in philosophy; nay, even in politics, where my Property, my Liberty, my Life, and the Life of my Posterity is not involved: In matters of mere speculation, let men wrangle as they please: But, when a matter has been thoroughly canvassed; when a whole empire have coolly determined, that certain measures are a robbery committed on their dearest rights; when they are striving to defend themselves, from the curse of Oppression; the individual who endeavours to defeat them, should be held in execration. In such a case, to speak against the struggles for Liberty, is a species of treason, not against the life of one man, but of millions. Every word, that tends to weaken the hands of the people is a crime of devilish dye. It is not a matter of indifference, my Countrymen, to be passed over by you with easy negligence. It is the unpardonable Sin in politics. What care I, whether you poison me with arsenic, or with infernal breath? whether you aim at my life with your sword, or your tongue? 'Tis no Less of Liberty, that court-minions can complain of, when they are silenced. No man has a right to say a word, which may lame the liberties of his country; after she has determined in what those liberties consist.

The ministry are evidently at a stand. The nation begins to rouse, and finds herself involved in difficulties. The question is not now, whether the blood of innocent thousands, on this side the sea, is worthy saving? This an object beneath the notice of the royal favourites: 'Tis whether the noble spirit of the nation will support their gut throats, in the execution. The hearts of Englishmen evidently revolt at the thought. You may still be free, my brave Countrymen! if you will be firm, and undivided. Ask you, the way in which all mankind have been enslaved? it has been by DIVISION. The sword has done nothing, in comparison to intestine jealousies. A thousand may be subdued by ten, if the ten can so make the interests of the thousand clash, as to let them by the ears. In the very harbour you may be shipwreck'd: there is a rock! Heaven grant you may be warned of it! If we may judge, by the public papers, filled with impatient threats of creditors, you are even now ready to break upon it—I mean that of the Law.

The gentlemen of the Law have, in former times, led the way, in spirited resolves to let the Raven sleep. We wait their motion now. The British annals, are an everlasting witness in favour of the bar. They have had the honour to stand foremost, in support of the rights of Englishmen, on both sides the water. They constituted almost half the late congress. If they would resolve yet once more, to refuse being the instruments of their country's distress, it would dispel the cloud that hangs over the present plan of America's Defence.

If the greater Number of them would now agree, to issue no more writs, for a limited time, it would disappoint the hopes of our enemies; who depend more upon the sinews of the Law, to overset our resolutions, than upon the Arms of Britain. Creditors should now remember the critical situation of affairs, and not hurry on their suits. Forbear each other, my Countrymen, and don't drive those, whom you have in your power, to wish to dissolve the grand association, on which our ALL depends. We hope, in a few months, to be delivered from this necessary restriction. While many are deprived of the power of paying their debts, by the restraint which the solemn agreements of their country have laid upon them, is it not cruel to push them, by distress, to struggle hard to break these agreements, on which your salvation depends? You will thereby turn the weapon of the Law against your country, yourselves, and your posterity.

If creditors, on the present emergency, will delay but six months, and they cannot recover much sooner; a great part of their debts will then be paid, and, we hope, the time be come, in which things may take their former channel, without injury. The month of May, we doubt not, will produce somewhat more decisive in favour of America, than has yet been. If the merchants are determined to push at all adventures, those who are prevented by the resolutions from the usual mode of payment; if the lawyers are determined to serve them; necessity will soon forcibly plead, that she knows NO LAW.

The Committee of the Colony have wisely taken up this matter; and we doubt not, that their resolves will operate. But, I would humbly propose, by way of addition.

1. That the inhabitants should agree, to lay aside for a time, all actions for debt; but such as, being laid before the committee of any District, shall appear to them necessary and unavoidable.

2. That the gentlemen of the law agree, not to prosecute any action; but such as shall be approved of by such committee.

3. That any person who shall break thro' such agreement, be publicly noted, as one who pays no due regard to the distresses of his country, and treated accordingly.

A CAROLINIAN, No. VII.

P. S. The writer, while he pleads the necessity of indulgence to debtors, in the present emergency of the colony, is in far happier, as to wish the indulgence of no man to himself.

From the PENNSYLVANIA PACKET, Nov. 25, 1774.

I HAVE lately read a piece entitled "a friendly address to all reasonable Americans," which appears to be the production of a pen extremely unfriendly to the liberties of America.—The arguments are uncandidly stated, and the author with much art has endeavoured to alarm our fears with the horrors of a civil war on the one hand, and on the other, to excite our jealousies of the motives to the opposition in those who are at present the foremost in the struggle.—The first I think we need not be much apprehensive of, whilst we remain united and good humoured with each other, for the power of Great-Britain will most assuredly never be employed to act offensively against us on shore; the last is too base and ungenerous a suspicion to be harboured in any breast that is fraught with honourable and charitable sentiments, and the whole piece will, I doubt not, be deservedly despised; and however much I might detect the writer if he was personally known, yet so great a veneration have I for that grand bulwark of liberty, the Freedom of the Press, that I earnestly wish no compulsive steps may be taken to discover the author; let the wretch live like a serpent in his den, and though venom exhales with his breath, till he actually dares to appear and bites in the face of day, let him rest unnoticed and unthought for.—Neglect, like a Winter's frost, will render him torpid—and for those who have been already hurt by his bite, let the skilful prepare their antidote and publish the cure.—When I see in the channel of every paper, the freedom with which the conduct of all ranks of people is boldly canvassed, I rejoice in the privilege, and though I sometimes find scurrility introduced instead of argument, and personal invective substituted for sound reasoning, yet I glory in the happy privilege of giving Kings their own, and knaves their due. The press waves all ceremony of introductory admission, and conveys by invisible magic the daring intruder into the royal presence, and there forces him to hear in the face of his court, that he is a tyrant, a monster, and a hated Prince—if such should be the opinion of his subjects.—A Minister is told that the whole nation esteems him a designing scoundrel, a Bishop that he is a sanctified villain, a Peer that he is a venal sycophant tool, a Judge that he is a more infamous wretch than the poor culprit condemned by his sentence from the bench, the Commoner that he is the most abject of slaves, bought and sold by his own consent.—These and more may be said by the silent type, and thousands shall hear the secret.—Now if such are the fruits of this glorious plant, let us not cramp its growth; let it luxuriantly spread its loaded branches, and let each gather the fruit that suits his palate, for it is of so wonderful a nature, that for every poison it can produce an antidote, for every evil it has its specific—I contend then that the press should be as free as air, and he who pries into the retirement of an author commits an outrage on public liberty.—Consider, gentlemen, when you begin to hunt us poor fellows who have an itch for writing, you cramp genius, you put us upon guarding our sentiments with such doubts and restraints that you often get a limping decrepid volunteer for your service instead of a sturdy, bold hearted, free born, free spoken Englishman—I speak from my own feelings, for were I sure that I could safely saug myself behind the ramparts of the press and sally out unnoticed and unperceived—many a scout should I make amongst the great and small, and ravage the quarters of the pretended patriot, the fly-boot faint, and the snarling scribbler—nor should the partial Printer escape my visit, if such there are to be found—I conjure you then, my countrymen, to beware of infringing this grand preserver of our liberties—if publications appear which are unfriendly to our cause or treasonable to the liberty of the land, let loose your writing bloodhounds, drive the crafty fox, and convince these bold intruders that wherever they appear you are ready for the chase—thus will you force them from every haunt, and preserve to yourselves a sound and healthy CONSTITUTION.
